WRITING

~~In~~ In my opinion, the quote means that we all have some scripted roles that we play in our daily lives.

To be honest, I don't know if I agree or disagree with that point of view. Although I prefer to believe that people have freedom to be whoever they want, make choices they think are right, I can't ~~ign~~ ignore that it still feels sometimes as if our actions have been written down in some kind of screenplay. It seems like we ~~are~~ were supposed to say what we've said so there could be a certain outcome or it had to teach us a lesson.

The thing is that it's hard to give examples from real life of something like this. No one knows for sure if our lives are planned out beforehand or we play by our own rules. These things are illustrated in different types of literature or films, <sup>154</sup> though. But usually there's a happy ending. I mean, it ends with characters realising they are <sup>no</sup> longer at someone else's will. Do we have the same ending? Where we finally have the knowledge of such a thing?

All in all, I think that the meaning of an author's words seems plainly simple at first but actually can be interpreted in lots of ~~the~~ ways. I myself can't decide. One of them is that every thing is staged and people are just actors.
