WRITING

I understand the authors point of view as follows:

Every person has a role in their life, each person is part of something bigger - a play, where every single actor should try their best to immerse the audience into the play, or ~~the~~ if the actors fail, the play will stop and everyone will be disappointed. But since the people are actors and the world is a stage, that means that life is the play. If life is a play, that means that it has a script on which it is based on. So life and everything that happens in it should happen. So if something happens don't panic or try to destroy it, it was meant to happen, adapt to the change, you r self. But in a play actors can tell the story, written in the ~~script~~ ^{script} differently, so you can change the future as they can, by acting differently, but you can't change what ~~already happened~~ ¹⁵⁰ ~~and~~ ^{happened}. So live in the present think of the future, forget the past.

I support this. Living while forgetting the past might sound bad, but no, you will still learn from your mistakes, focus on what you can do, not what had already happened. Try to strive for improvement of yourself as a person, not power and money!

Concluding all of the above you can say that William Shakespeare had a brilliant view on life: think about the future and present, not the past, whilst striving to become a better person.
